humans do when machines take over most of their jobs?” Gartner's (Gartner) Jay Ritter asks. Ritter describes the state of the industry as “useless,” saying: “We spend way too much time talking about it and not enough time delivering on it.” It’s a question he’s often heard from clients: “How do I go from talking about the CIO’s role to delivering?”
To which Ritter says, “It’s just ridiculous.” “We are a 99ers, not a CIOs club,” he said during a wide-ranging session with Computerworld Senior Editor Stephen Foskett and me at Gartner’s Quest in Half Moon Bay, California last Thursday. “We are not a consulting shop or a marketing shop,” Ritter said. Hence Ritter’s decision to take the reigns of the CIO site from Vivien Su, who at 40 is the youngest CIO on the cover. (Su is now interim CIO.) * * * Technologists have long toyed with the idea that humans will eventually lose their jobs to AI, if not to machines. But Ritter is more than skeptical; he’s downright fatalistic, telling the audience: “We are in for a very hard time.” He puts the blame for the state of things on government regulation. “The government is on the way to doing the things they’re totally against,” he said, including: Regulating the internet in terms of net neutrality. “It’s the single biggest mistake they made and its going to
